

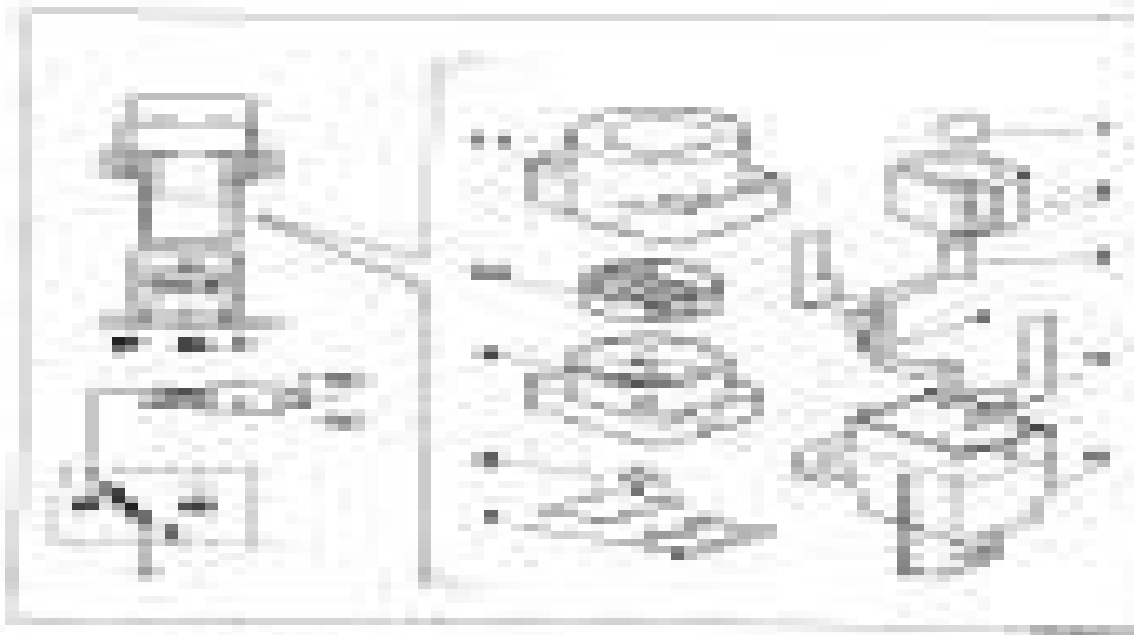

Diagram illustrating the greenhouse effect. Light rays from the sun enter the greenhouse and are reflected back inside, warming the interior.

The greenhouse effect is a natural process that warms the Earth's surface. When the Sun's rays hit the Earth, some of the energy is absorbed by the ground and water. This energy is then transferred to the air in the form of heat. The air molecules vibrate and move faster, which warms the air. Some of the heat is lost to space, but some is reflected back to the Earth by greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide and water vapor. This process keeps the Earth warm enough for life to exist.
