while the rearfoot was beginning to supinate The analysis of the motion curves of the navicular drop and subtalar joint indicate that the timing of foot motion is more important than the amount of linear or angular displacement The relationship between displacement measurements may be negligible when determining the effect of the amount of pronation on the risk of injury The timing variations seen within the subtalar joint and midfoot could lead to dysfunction of other structures specifically the soft tissues which would have to compensate for the altered movement patterns A weakness or abnormality could lead to a breakdown which in turn could lead to injury
