Kraft,2017 The Wisconsin Deer Donation Program WDDP commenced through state legislation in 2000 primarily as a way to lower agricultural damage caused by white tailed deer WTD However it innovatively consolidates two seemingly disparate goals combating excessive deer populations and provision of high quality protein to Wisconsin food pantry clients This case study essentially possessed two primary objectives It initially sought to elucidate the inner workings of a state administered venison donation program An evolutionary outline of wild game donation practices was presented along with a detailed examination of WDDP and the source from which the program derives a large portion of its funding the state Wildlife Damage Abatement Claims Program WDACP The available scientific information regarding historical and current Wisconsin deer population trends was additionally conveyed The author also investigated potential reasons for a steady decline in WDDP hunter and processor involvement Specific causes for the decreases were largely unknown to administrators and interested stakeholders Three methods were used by the author to examine this issue First the potential influence of individual factors that may be contributing to WDDP participatory decline by hunters as well as decreasing state hunter deer harvest was scrutinized by the author using linear regression analyses Second WDDP processor involvement was statistically investigated using a telephone survey of 2015 s participating processors Third a qualitative content analysis of Wisconsin State Journal WSJ articles was conducted in order to understand the main issues surrounding the program as portrayed through the lens of the media Based upon the results many recommendations have been formulated to restore WDDP hunter and processor participation Hunter involvement would likely benefit from increased Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources WDNR public relations campaigns using print and online media as well as intensified agency efforts to recruit and retain deer hunters in eastern Wisconsin Farmers Hunters Feeding the Hungry FHFH stated its organization would be willing to aid in incentivizing hunter donation to the program through lottery drawings for hunting equipment and bonus tag reimbursement. The best way to entice processors back to the program is through increasing compensation rates for processing of donated deer. Based upon processor survey results a flat rate of 75 per donated deer in non CWD affected counties and 85 per donated deer in CWD impacted counties should satisfy processor reimbursement desires. In addition several programmatic rule changes by WDNR are advised.
