

Intro

Both Incapsula and CloudFlare WAF services have improved their protection mechanisms and detection methodologies since the previous evaluation. That being said, we decided to put them on yet another heavy test and see what filters we can evade/bypass. All the settings were set to maximum level of protection in both testing environments.

This time we used several real-world applications vulnerable to different types of attack vectors to simulate a real hacking scenario against the firewall services of both vendors.

Along with the vulnerable applications, we used an improved PoC script file to test the solutions against generic attack vectors and their learning mechanisms. This script was written by us and it basically allows calling unsanitized input from the users which allowed us to exploit it and manipulate the results in several ways which would confirm 100% whether or not the filter was indeed working as expected.

Setup and configuration

We're not going in details on how to setup CloudFlare and Incapsula services. Refer to the previous report for more details. All we can say here is that the infrastructure design has remained the same which is the WAF sitting in front of the dedicated server, intercepting all requests that are destined for it. The setup process from client's perspective has stayed the same as well. We've set everything to 'ON' and 'HIGH' for both WAF options.
