Topic: Design and Development of MEMS Based Strain Sensors for Industrial Applications

Measurement of mechanical parameters in any industry plays a vital role in providing the information about the healthy systems of the plant and machinery in any industry. Various instruments with sensors are developed for measurement of such parameters which provides the required information about the health status of the plant and machinery. In the current day world even monitoring the building status, towers and dams has also gained the legislation mandatory to prevent or minimize the effect of dynamic changes of the atmosphere on the construction.

For any measurement, sensors plays a vital role in sensing the change in the value of the measured variable and provide a meaningful signal corresponding value of the variable which can be further processed obtain the useful data and take corrective action. Sensors measuring capability depends on the characteristics of the sensor which vary with environmental parameters like temperature, pressure, humidity to which they are exposed. Among all these parameters temperature effect on sensor is very critical as it will degrade the sensing capability of the sensor.

Sensors which are mounted in the industrial machinery are exposed to harsh environments like high temperature, corrosion, erosion etc., which will degrade the performance. Especially the sensors mounted on Jet engines, turbines in the power plants, drilling equipment in the petroleum and gas industry which are intended to measure the strain in the mechanical parts of the equipment need to measure the mechanical strain at an elevated temperature. Therefore, These sensors are to be designed to have immunity to the effect of harsh industrial environment to provide accurate and exact measurement information.

Most of the sensors, used in the industry, are designed to measure the industrial parameters are bulky and they provide overall measurand information within the proximity of the sensor rather than providing a specific point information. Whereas in case of engines,
