Building the Leadership Pipeline

Robert J. Lavigna,2013-07-01 There are more than 80 million baby boomers in the United States today and they account for almost 28 percent of our nation s population As these workers retire the entire nation will face a workforce crisis This crisis will hit government first because public sector workers are on average older than private sector workers Moreover most public servants can retire earlier than their private sector counterparts To respond to this workforce crisis public organizations need to build their leadership pipelines There are two main approaches to developing the leadership pipeline the traditional just in time approach and the integrated approach These approaches can be viewed as the opposite ends of a continuum with most organizations practices falling somewhere in between Building the Leadership Pipeline presents case studies of practical and effective leadership development practices to help government build the next generation of leaders These practices include integrating theory and practice through action learning and other real life projects succession planning rotational and or developmental assignments internships data driven development based on assessments feedback and other sources senior leaders involvement and structured relationship building
