CHAPTER

Financial Crises in Emerging Market Economies

➤ PREVIEW

Before 2007 the most prominent examples of severe financial crises in recent times came from abroad. Particularly vulnerable were emerging market economies, which opened their markets to the outside world in the 1990s with high hopes of rapid economic growth and reduced poverty. Instead, however, many of these nations experienced financial crises as debilitating as the Great Depression was in the United States.

Most dramatic were the Mexican crisis that began in 1994, the East Asian crisis that began in July 1997, and the Argentine crisis, which started in 2001. These events present a puzzle for economists: how can a developing country shift so dramatically from a path of high growth—as did Mexico and particularly the East Asian countries of Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia, the Philippines, and South Korea—to such a sharp decline in economic activity?

In this chapter we apply the asymmetric information theory of financial crises developed in Chapter 8 to investigate the cause of frequent and devastating financial crises in emerging market economies. First we explore the dynamics of financial crises in emerging market economies. Then we apply the analysis to the events surrounding financial crises in two of these economies in recent years and explore why these crises caused such devastating contractions of economic activity.
