Learning Disabilities – Chapter 5

Describe how Learning Disabilities affect the following:

Reading

The most common teachers see among children who have a learning disability. Many children with learning disabilities typically have severe difficulties with phonological awareness, which is the ability to separate sounds and phonemes of words. Comprehension problems become more of an issue for these students when asked to read to themselves and apply the material to content areas.

Writing

Students with learning disabilities perform significantly lower than their peers without disabilities on all written expression tasks. Some students with learning disabilities are great readers but poor writers. Students who have trouble writing seldom use tools to help them organize their writing thus having poorly composed writings. When provided explicit instruction students' writing has improved over time.

Math

Children with learning disabilities can also experience issues with mathematics. Many researchers predict these deficits may be due to working memory. The best techniques to help students with a learning disability in mathematics are guided practice, explicit instruction, and feedback.

Social Skills

Students with learning disabilities are prone to having social skills problems. These difficulties may be caused by different issues such as rejection, and unpleasant interactions with teachers or peers. To prevent this from happening researchers have created social skill training that teachers can incorporate into their lessons.

Attention

Students with learning disabilities may also experience attending to a task or display hyperactivity. Children who persistently exhibit these symptoms may be diagnosed with attention deficit/ hyperactivity disorder. Researchers have learned that when a child has a learning disability they are more likely to be diagnosed with ADHD.
