

Messer, S.B. (2011). Review of McCleod, J., Case study research in counselling and psychotherapy. Counselling and Psychotherapy Research, 11, 85-86.

In order to provide a context for McCleod's very timely and important volume on case study research, I will summarize an article by Stewart and Chambliss (2010) that makes a powerful statement about the relative importance to practicing psychologists of case studies vs. statistically based research data. Psychologists in private practice were randomly assigned to receive either (1) a research review of data from randomized controlled trials of cognitive-behavioral treatment and medication for bulimia, (2) a case study, including treatment by CBT, for a fictional patient with bulimia or (3) both. The practitioners' primary theoretical orientations were cognitive behavioral (40%), psychodynamic (28%), eclectic (20%) and 12% other. The dependent variables were attitudes toward CBT, e.g., how likely they would be to use CBT for a patient with bulimia. The second dependent variable was how willing they were to be trained in CBT or in another treatment of their choice for bulimia .

The primary hypotheses were that clinicians provided with the case (1) would find statistical review information about empirically supported treatments (ESTs) more compelling than without the case (2) would be more likely than those who did not receive the case to hold positive attitudes toward CBT for bulimia and (3) would be willing to receive CBT training. These hypothesis were confirmed. In other words, having the case was very important in determining their positive attitudes and willingness to be trained.

The next question was whether the information based on a statistical research review had any impact. Contrary to their hypothesis that participants would pay attention to research by nature of their doctoral training (80% had PhDs; others had PsyDs and EdDs)—the statistical,
