governing art provenance developed after World War II and became institutionalized in the 1990s and 2000s. Since then there have been national and global social movements demanding the return of looted art. This shift has established not only that looting is wrong but more importantly that restitution is morally right. As a result of this reframing of what it means to own art, an artifact's historical provenance has become a core element of its value, and the search for provenance and demands for restitution a direct threat to state status. The same objects that granted states high international status now threaten to provoke status decline. In The Art of Status, Jelena Subotic examines this relationship between the restitution of looted art and international status with a focus on the Parthenon Elgin Marbles, the Benin Bronzes, and a collection of paintings looted during the Holocaust that are now housed at the Serbian National Museum. Subotic tells the story of these artworks, how they were looted, how they ended up on display in national museums, and how the art restitution disputes have unfolded. While these cases are different in terms of their historical context of looting and ownership claims, the movements for their restitution and resistance to it illustrate the larger questions of how national cultural heritage is internationally constructed and how it serves states' desire for international status and prestige. An in-depth and nuanced account of art restitution disputes, The Art of Status illuminates the shifting political significance of art on the international stage from ownership to restitution.

The Oxford Handbook of Media Psychology Karen E. Shackleford, Nicholas D.

Bowman, 2025-07-16 The 21st century has seen the use of media technologies become thoroughly integrated with our daily lives; most of us feel lost without our mobile device in hand, check social media multiple times a day, and turn to digital entertainment in our free time. This shift has spurred the emergence of media psychology, a multidisciplinary approach to studying how people use, process, and are affected by the media and technology they engage every day. This second edition of The Oxford Handbook of Media Psychology brings together leading experts in the field to update what is a rapidly evolving area of study. Returning contributors expand chapters on the history and progress of media literacy, research methods, parasocial experiences, and race and the media, among others. New chapters tackle cutting-edge issues like artificial intelligence, research in media and social justice, the impact of deep fakes and social media on conspiracy theories, the psychology of fandom, the self as reflected in avatars, the evolution of video games and virtual reality, and the psychological experience of the pandemic related to media use. Together, this volume retains and broadens our understanding of the foundational aspects of media psychology, from research methods and theory to fields like cognitive and developmental psychology. It presents novel approaches to how we conceptualize, operationalize, and analyze media psychological phenomena. Building on the field-defining research of the first edition, this update collects scholarship covering the most essential developments in media psychology in the last decade.

Discourse and Identity Bethan Benwell, 2006-03-15

Identity is a central organizing feature of our social world. Across the social sciences and humanities, it is increasingly treated as something that is actively and publicly accomplished in discourse. This book defines identity in its broadest sense in terms

Discoursal Construction of Academic Identity in Cyberspace

Małgorzata Sokół, 2011-10-18 The aim of this volume is to look into how academic identity is discursively constructed in CMC computer mediated communication using the example of an e seminar An e seminar is an asynchronous type of CMC where private public and institutional domains merge and therefore it provides an interesting context for exploring academic communication phenomena in cyberspace The linguistic cues of academic identity can be identified on three levels of discourse organisation the features of lexico grammar textual macrostructures and genres In general the analysis shows how these three levels of discourse organisation contribute towards how academics negotiate their identities relative to the aims and activities of their discourse communities and relative to their individual goals The discursive construction of academic identity in electronic discourse depends also on such factors as the medium's defining properties and the lack of direct physical contact between interactants An important finding is the confirmation of the individuating character of the medium i.e. the authors self presentation in an e seminar is characterised by their distinctive voice and increased self disclosure Communication in this context enhances individuality which bears important consequences for how academics negotiate their identity in electronic discourse exploiting the possibilities offered by the new medium The results of the analysis reveal how important it is for scholars to maintain a legitimate identity in an e seminar Virtual academic identity as constructed in this context is as an extension of academic identity constructed in the real world The new communicative medium seems to have extended the repertoire of effective means of self promotion and the presentation of academic achievements and expertise These aspects have become important for academic interaction in today's world which is characterised by such phenomena as the internationalisation and globalisation of scholarship commodification of science and intensified competition The book will be of interest to students and researchers in the fields of discourse analysis academic literacy rhetoric and genre studies and to all those concerned with the complexities of identity work in the context of computer mediated communication
