

1. Colleges want to know what your parents do and their true background. Your background helps to frame your application.
2. When you are asked to self-report your rank and GPA scale and be honest. Colleges will be looking at what you report.
3. If you think your senior courses will change, wait to fill out "seniors." If you drop a course or replace it, you will need institutions don't like it when a student indicates the rigor.
4. Always load with your core, academic classes first when it comes more than non-academic classes like Page 26, then.
5. You only have space to indicate five academic honors. Check report, don't skip.
6. Look at your college list and determine how each college is going to view reports and reporting. This allows you to fill the application in the writing section. Other colleges will be more or less.
7. Under "Activities," you only have room to list ten things and what you include. It's not about how many activities you report you have made. Make sure you list activities important activity you do.
8. The essay essay is typically required at most institutions. If optional, I would recommend sending it.
9. Have proof for everything you report. Since the admissions verify specific items listed in the application to ensure a.
10. Be very truthful when using the "Additional Information" section. Admissions officers really get annoyed when that are not necessary in the admissions process.
