

Why Animal Testing Should Be Banned?

Probably you never thought how the testing of the daily products you use is ending animals' lives. All around the world, animals, mostly mammals, are used as disposable laboratory equipment to test products with potentially harmful chemicals. Medical treatments, household cleaners, food additives, and cosmetics are among them. It is beyond doubt, there is no limit to the amount of pain that can be inflicted on animals during those experiments. Their suffering goes further than just inhaling toxic fumes, they endure being crippled, perforations in the skull, skin burned, and spinal cords crushed, altogether caving the way to their death. Animal testing is cruel, it does not predict the result in human beings, and it is not needed because other means of testing product toxicity are available. Each of those aspects makes a reasoned argument for banning what is now ending animals' life.

As has already been mentioned, one of the major reasons animal testing should be banned is because of the cruelty towards them. Right now society is looking for their advanced welfare and to reach it they subject animals to painful tests that not only inflict physical pain on them but also psychological distress and suffering. In particular, humans private animals from food, burn their skin to discover a new healing process, expose them to toxic substances, and an endless number of other procedures. To give you an example of how bad this is, The Human Society for the United States (n.d.) presented an undercover investigation that documented the case of a dog named Riley. This dog was used to test a substance so toxic that brought him near death after two days of forced dosing. According to the organization, the dog was getting dosed off with a toxic substance even though he was hyper-salivating, trembling, vomiting, and moaning. Later, he lay on the floor, unable to stand, and left in excruciating pain. This case and the cases of others should be the motivation to stop the needless waste of animal life.

Besides being cruel, animal testing is not reliable in predicting human outcomes. Dr. Christopher Austin, former director of the National Institutes of Health (NIH) Chemical Genomics Center said something completely awesome "Traditional animal testing is expensive, time-consuming, uses a lot of animals, and from a scientific perspective the results do not necessarily translate to humans." From his outlook, it is easy to infer that drugs tested on animals are not surely safe for humans. Some chemicals might not cause harmful responses to animals but they do in humans. To bolster this argument, take into consideration what (ProCon.org, 2023) mentions in one of its articles: "Animal tests on the arthritis drug Vioxx showed that it had a protective effect on the hearts of mice, yet the drug went on to cause more than 27,000 heart attacks and sudden cardiac deaths before being pulled from the market". At the end something "effective" for animals might be the cause of injuries or even death of a person.
