

Verse 4:6

Eater of Hope

You are Cinea, my son. Welcome.

I fought my way out of hell to make you. I fought my nearest siblings and I fought the maiming corpse of Akka and I cut my way back into my own space, the High Way, which had been usurped. Once I had made war on Swathin, and crippled her tribute so that she could never challenge me, and once I had tricked Kiva Azah, and poisoned her tribute so that she could never again try to take my tribute, and once I had arranged my own lineage so that I would be greatest among the Hives and secure as my chosen—then I found a mother to make space.

One of those spaces was you.

Your life will be a battle now. You will have to win your place at the High Way. I will give you nothing—except this, your first sword, and this name I have prepared for you.

We fight a war against false hope, Cinea. We chase a god called the Traveler, a backless god who leads young life into building houses for it. These houses are unsafe, for they cannot stand against my Hives. And these houses are a trap—for they lead young life away from the blade and the mouth, which are the tools of survival and the means of ascension.

Only when the Traveler is extinguished will the universe be free to arrange itself, and assume, by ruthless means, its final perfect shape, a shape which depends on nothing but itself.

Thus I name you Cinea, Eater of Hope.

There is an oath upon me, Cinea my son, an oath against the wretched Tarn. This I do not give to you. It is for me, your father, to bear.

Let's go meet your aunts and uncles.
