Abstract: This study aims to explore the experiences of young people in the UK who have been involved in the criminal justice system, and to identify the factors that influence their engagement with the system. The study is based on a qualitative approach, using semi-structured interviews with 12 young people aged 16-18 years. The findings suggest that young people's engagement with the criminal justice system is influenced by a range of factors, including their social background, their attitudes towards the system, and the support they receive from their family and friends. The study also highlights the importance of providing young people with information and support to help them understand the criminal justice system and make informed decisions about their future.
