There is disagreement about how anthropologists apply their theories to contemporary populations. Many are post-structuralist, or "deconstructivist," which means that they believe that the social and cultural world is not as it seems, but is instead a complex of power relations and discourses that are constantly being re-created and re-negotiated. Others are more "pragmatic" or "realist," which means that they believe that the social and cultural world is what it is, and that it can be studied and understood as it is.
