Caroline SchoolDefinition*Metabolism

Metabolism includes all the reactions and processes involved in growth, development, and maintenance of an organism. It is the sum of all the chemical reactions that occur in an organism. Metabolism is divided into two main categories: catabolism and anabolism. Catabolism is the breakdown of complex molecules into simpler ones, releasing energy. Anabolism is the synthesis of complex molecules from simpler ones, requiring energy. Metabolism is regulated by enzymes, which are proteins that act as catalysts for chemical reactions. The rate of metabolism is influenced by factors such as temperature, pH, and the concentration of reactants and products.

The catabolic pathways are responsible for the breakdown of large molecules into smaller ones, releasing energy. These pathways include glycolysis, the citric acid cycle, and oxidative phosphorylation. The anabolic pathways are responsible for the synthesis of large molecules from smaller ones, requiring energy. These pathways include gluconeogenesis, the citric acid cycle, and fatty acid synthesis. Metabolism is a highly regulated process, and any disruption can lead to disease.

Another class of biomolecules, proteins, are polymers of amino acids. They serve as enzymes and are involved in almost all biological processes. They are also involved in cell signaling, cell adhesion, and cell movement. Proteins are synthesized in the ribosome and are then modified by various enzymes to form functional proteins. The modification of proteins is a highly regulated process, and any disruption can lead to disease.

Lipids, macromolecules composed of glycerol and fatty acids, are also involved in cell signaling and energy storage. They are synthesized in the liver and are then transported to other parts of the body. Lipids are also involved in the structure of cell membranes and are essential for the function of many enzymes. The metabolism of lipids is a highly regulated process, and any disruption can lead to disease.

Carbohydrates, such as glucose and fructose, are also involved in cell signaling and energy storage. They are synthesized in the liver and are then transported to other parts of the body. Carbohydrates are also involved in the structure of cell membranes and are essential for the function of many enzymes. The metabolism of carbohydrates is a highly regulated process, and any disruption can lead to disease.

Pre-laboratory Questions
