Advanced Plant Genetics of Corn Kit

Objectives

Students will:

- 1. use monohybrid genetic crosses,
- 2. understand how wing phenotypes
- 3. confirm Mendel's law of inheritance and the relationship between genotype and phenotype,
- 4. understand how genotype and phenotype are related to each other,
- 5. compare and contrast monohybrid and dihybrid crosses.

Students will also understand that:

- 1. dominant and recessive traits are inherited from parents.
- 2. dominant and recessive traits are inherited from parents.
- 3. dominant and recessive traits are inherited from parents.

Background

When a plant is crossed with a plant that has a different trait, the offspring will have a different trait. This is called a monohybrid cross. The offspring will have a different trait because of the different traits of the parents.

Monohybrid crosses are performed by crossing two plants that have different traits. For example, if a plant with a dominant trait (e.g., tall) is crossed with a plant with a recessive trait (e.g., short), the offspring will have a different trait (e.g., tall). This is because the dominant trait is passed on to the offspring, and the recessive trait is not passed on. The offspring will have a different trait because of the different traits of the parents.

When a plant is crossed with a plant that has a different trait, the offspring will have a different trait. This is called a monohybrid cross. The offspring will have a different trait because of the different traits of the parents.
