

position or orientation from their respective.

The following sections will then introduce these other more advanced tools for estimating vehicle kinematics and their future state trajectory and at how each model can meet the aforementioned requirements effectively.

The following sections will then focus on how these different approaches will be combined to form a hybrid solution that will be able to automatically estimate vehicle kinematics and their future state trajectory using multiple sensors.

Any kinematics estimation algorithm requires position and orientation position, current sensor fusion needs to consider the sensor's position and update them during time. This will prevent any static sensor output from being used, but will prevent any static output from being used and make sure no errors, are present in Fig. 1, shows a diagram of position estimation.

The following sections focus on how we can combine these two methods and implement them.

However, we must always take into account, when combining these two methods, how much we need to trust our sensors. Sensors are not perfect, therefore, there are some errors in the sensor's output. Therefore, we must take into account these errors when combining these two methods.
