Before 1914, the world lived in capitalism, where free markets dominated and there was minimal government intervention in the economy. The industries were largely protected and monopolized. However, after WWI capitalism lost popularity and Keynesian theory gained popularity in the West. Keynes advocated for government regulation in the economy. After WW2, Keynesian government took control over the economy through high taxes, social nationalization, etc. However, with the political changes in the 1980s came a change in economic policy. Political governments stopped using Keynesian theory and instead supported free deregulation and monetarism and privatization of markets. In that sense, economic policies shifted in direction that sought to return to the classic and policies of the 1920s.
