This anatomical illustration depicts a human figure from the front, with the skin removed to reveal the underlying musculature and internal organs. The figure is standing with arms slightly away from the body. The central focus is the thoracic and abdominal cavities. The lungs are shown in the chest, with the heart positioned between them. The stomach is located in the upper abdomen, and the large, coiled small intestine fills the lower abdominal region. The liver is visible on the right side of the abdomen. The skeletal structure, including the skull, ribs, and pelvis, is clearly visible. Numerous Latin labels are placed around the figure, with lines pointing to specific anatomical features. The labels are arranged in two columns on the left and right sides of the figure. The illustration is a detailed engraving, likely from a medical text or atlas.
