Innovations in maternal and child health: case studies from Uganda

Phyllis Awor^{1*}, Maxencia Nabiryo¹ and Lenore Manderson^{2,3,4}

Abstract

Background: Nearly 300 children and 20 mothers die from preventable causes daily, in Uganda. Communities often identify and introduce pragmatic and lasting solutions to such challenging health problems. However, little is known of these solutions beyond their immediate surroundings. If local and pragmatic innovations were scaled-up, they could contribute to better health outcomes for larger populations. In 2017 an open call was made for local examples of community-based solutions that contribute to improving maternal and child health in Uganda. In this article, we describe three top innovative community-based solutions and their contributions to maternal health.

Main text: In this study, all innovations were implemented by non-government entities. Two case studies highlight the importance of bringing reproductive health and maternal delivery services closer to populations, through providing accessible shelters and maternity waiting homes in isolated areas. The third case study focuses on bringing obstetric imaging services to lower level rural health facilities, which usually do not provide this service, through task-shifting certain sonography services to midwives. Various health system and policy relevant lessons are highlighted.

Conclusions: The described case studies show how delays in access to health care by pregnant women in rural communities can be systematically removed, to improve pregnancy and delivery outcomes. Emphasis should be put on identification, capacity building and research to support the scale up of these community-based health solutions.

Background

Every day, about 300 neonates and infants and 20 mothers die from preventable causes in Uganda [1]. Most of these deaths occur during delivery and within the first month of life. These deaths are mainly caused by complications to the mother and child in labour and during delivery, and in association with infectious diseases of poverty including malaria, pneumonia, sepsis and HIV/AIDS [2]. These statistics have remained almost the same over the past 10 years, while the Ugandan government (like others in low income countries) is grappling with low human resources for health, lack of medicines, equipment and diagnostics, weak governance, and limited funding for health [3].

In Uganda, maternal mortality is mainly attributed to the “three delays”: delay in making the decision to seek care; delay in reaching a health facility in time; and delay in receiving adequate treatment [4]. The first delay is attributed to the failure of the mother, her family, or the community to recognize a life-threatening condition; in this context, lack of awareness of pregnancy-related health risks is a major reason for the low uptake of maternal health services [5]. The second delay is associated with delays in reaching a health centre, due to road conditions, lack of or cost of transportation, or location of the facility: over 40% of rural women in Uganda report

Remoteness, urbanization and child nutrition in sub-Saharan Africa Headey, Derek D., Stifel, David, You, Liangzhi, Guo, Zhe, 2017-12-23 Reducing undernutrition requires improving access to goods and services from a wide range of economic and social sectors including agriculture education and health Yet despite broad agreement on the multisectoral nature of the global burden of undernutrition relatively little research has analyzed how different dimensions of accessibility such as urbanization and travel times to urban centers affect child nutrition and dietary outcomes In this paper we study these relationships in sub-Saharan Africa a highly rural continent still severely hindered by remoteness problems We link spatial data on travel times to 20 000 person cities to survey data from 10 900 communities in 23 countries We document strong negative associations between nutrition indicators and rural livelihoods but only moderately strong associations with remoteness to cities Moreover the harmful effects of remoteness and rural living largely disappear once education wealth and social infrastructural services indicators are added to the model This implies that the key nutritional disadvantage of rural populations stems chiefly from social and economic poverty Combating these problems requires either an acceleration of urbanization processes or finding innovative cost effective mechanisms for extending basic services to isolated rural communities
