How to Constitute a World Eva Brann,2017-09-19 Eva Brann who has taught at St John s College Annapolis for sixty years wrote these essays largely as clarifying incitements to students who were reading or ought to have been reading the works discussed In her words The first essay looks at the Pre Socratics Heraclitus and Parmenides They appear to be in radical opposition but they are really doing the same new thing seeing the world as an intelligible whole Both observe external nature construing it in their minds so from the outside in The final essay again describes two ways of world construing from the outside in one by penetrating the surface of reality the other by spinning a web of complexity over it The five essays in between focus on works by Kant and display the world as constituted from the human inside out An appreciative review of the Critique of Pure Reason shows how Kant brilliantly justifies a science of nature by making nature itself the construct of our understanding But he leads us to the abyss of more idealism externality and realism escape him The explication of his one absolute moral commandment similarly defines his morality entirely in terms divorced from objective good and concentrated on internal integrity Finally his huge unpublished legacy agonizes about bringing a god first conceived as an inner need into external existence Charles Dickens: Complete Works Charles Dickens,2023-12-29
