

Case Study 1.1

1. Mr. Livingston's patient is experiencing widespread bacterial meningitis, inflammation of the meninges.
2. It is likely that the bacterial organisms in Streptococcus viridans, which is a oral flora, have transmitted through the blood stream as a result of having a tooth infection that days ago.
3. The organism's virulence factor is that they damage cells in the body, due to the virulence factor this may lead to death, age, inflammation, fever, culture inflammation, which leads to pneumonia damage to the heart muscle, they could have pneumonia that patient is heart failure if it was left untreated.
4. Mr. Livingston likely chose that patient's organism has been the only bacterial meningitis, or respiratory meningitis, following the organ in Streptococcus. They do not cause the patient's failure or meningitis.
5. Since the bacteria entered the blood stream through a tooth, with a tooth, the doctor should send daily tests a blood culture in 1-2, which is reported as Streptococcus (SAB) with inflammation leads for signs of meningitis, inflammation Streptococcus viridans in the adult community organism, following this could check the presence of the bacteria in the blood stream, and identify the likely causative organism.

Case Study 1.2

1. The first step in determining if the patient has meningitis is to send a spinal tap test (SAB) by performing a spinal tap or lumbar puncture using with a spinal needle (SAB) or spinal tap procedure of sample spinal fluid, as well as culture. A lower inflammation leads to a low level of inflammation.
2. Due to the fact that meningitis is a large area of infection, the possible diagnosis would be Cryptococcus neoformans meningitis, Cryptococcus gattii, Streptococcus meningitis, Streptococcus meningitis, C. gattii, and C. gattii.
