

CONSTANT STRENGTH BEAM

AIM:

To determine the stress at various locations along the length of a constant strength beam to show that they are equal and compare with theoretical values.

THEORY:

The aerospace structures engineer is constantly searching for types of structures which will save structural weight and still provide a structure which is satisfactory from a fabrication and economic standpoint. One such structure is constant strength beam.

A beam in which section modulus varies along the length of the beam in the same proportion as the bending moment is known as constant strength beam. In this case the maximum stress remains constant along the length of the beam.

b = width of the beam (thickness)

h = depth of the beam

L = length of the beam

M = bending moment = $BM = \text{load} \times \text{beam length} \times 9.81$
