

CHAPTER 4: POPULATION: WORLD PATTERNS, REGIONAL TRENDS

OVERVIEW

1. Population geography deals with the growth, composition, and distribution of people in relation to spatial variations in physical and cultural geographic conditions. Demographic measures basic to the geographic analysis of population include the crude birth rate, crude death rate, and rate of natural increase.
2. The population pyramid gives a visual summary of the age and sex structure of national populations. The shape of the pyramid differs regionally and between developed and developing countries.
3. Stage of economic development is a principal correlate of birth and fertility rates; the highest rates are found in the agricultural regions of developing countries. Death rates are less clearly associated with developmental level. Even in underdeveloped countries, mortality declines have occurred with improved sanitation and medical care.
4. The doubling time for world population steadily decreased to a low of 39 years in 1990; since then the trend has reversed, with doubling times rising to over 50 years at the start of the 21st century. The expanding base population is so large that each additional doubling results in massive numerical increases.
5. Following a pattern set in northwestern Europe after the Industrial Revolution, many countries have completed a four-stage demographic transition during which high birth and death rates have been replaced by low rates of both. The transition model may not prevail in all world areas because (1) the death rate has already been lowered without corresponding economic development; (2) emigration as a release for rapid population growth is no longer available as it was for Europe; and (3) existing populations are already so large that even lower rates of increase still mean great numerical additions.

6. The world's population is unevenly distributed, with most people found north of the equator, in lowland zones, on continental margins, and (decreasingly) in rural areas. Four great world population clusters exist in East Asia, South Asia, Europe, and eastern Anglo America.
7. Population density measures include crude density and physiological density. Overcrowding or overpopulation is not a density measure; it is a value judgment concerning numbers related to resources and environmental degradation.
8. Population data are not fully reliable, but projections based on alternate assumptions concerning them suggest that for some world areas, population pressures are increasing seriously. Thomas Malthus called attention to the inevitability of unsupportable population growth in 1798. Neo-Malthusianism is one spur for national programs of population control, though demographic momentum assures continued growth for many developing countries even if stringent family planning is adopted.
