A META-ANALYTIC REVIEW OF FUNCTIONAL ANALYTIC PSYCHOTHERAPY SINGLE SUBJECT RESEARCH Rajinder Jitkaur Singh, 2016 Functional Analytic Psychotherapy FAP is a contextual behavior therapy that utilizes basic behavior principles to implement change inside of session with the idea that it will generalize outside of session The therapist focuses on punishing problematic behavior CRB1s in session and reinforcing more adaptive behavior CRB2s The FAP therapist uses the five rules of FAP in order to guide therapy sessions Although FAP has existed as a therapy for over two decades there is a limited amount of research examining its efficacy and the majority of FAP efficacy studies used single subject data Although the research on the efficacy of FAP is sparse some consider single subject data to be one of the initial steps in developing evidence based practices Horner et al 2005 The current study aimed to synthesize data from FAP single subject design research in order to provide a quantitative estimate of its efficacy The results indicated there is variation in demographics of participants and overall effect sizes for this meta analysis fell in the moderately effective to fairly effective range or were considered significant depending on the metric used Overall the results indicate the efficacy of FAP is promising but there is a need for research with stronger methodology

The Impact of Training in Functional Analytic Psychotherapy on the Therapists' Target Behaviors Lindsey E. Knott, University of Houston--Clear Lake. School of Human Sciences and Humanities, 2014 Functional Analytic Psychotherapy FAP is a behavior analytic approach to the treatment of interpersonal dysfunction that proposes that the therapeutic relationship serves as a microcosm of typical interpersonal relationships Tsai Kohlenberg Kanter Kohlenberg Follette Callaghan 2009 Whether dysfunctional or desirable behavior therapists report similar interpersonal behavior within the therapeutic context as within their own personal relationships Knott Wetterneck Derr Tolentino 2014 As such FAP trainings are designed to extinguish therapist dysfunctional behaviors and shape more adaptive risk taking behaviors to increase therapeutic connectedness and also to provide therapists with necessary skills to shape client behaviors There is limited research to support the assertion that clinical training in FAP alters the way therapists engage interpersonally with clients and others see Kanter Tsai Holman Koerner 2013 The current study examined idiographic interpersonal behaviors performed outside of session for ten participants undergoing an 8 week FAP training The ten participants were either graduate student or master's level therapists who participated in a FAP training of up to eight weekly three hour sessions We hypothesized that therapists would demonstrate increased use of functional and decreased use of maladaptive out of session behaviors throughout the training Further we hypothesized that increased use of out of session functional behaviors would be associated with changes on specific items on the Functional Idiographic Assessment Template Questionnaire FIAT Q We also broadly explored differences in pre to post training assessments of several interpersonally relevant measures Results indicated partial support for increase in desirable out of session behavior and decrease in maladaptive out of session behavior Furthermore results indicated partial support for changes in FIAT Q items related to these behaviors. These results suggest that targeting dysfunctional behaviors within FAP trainings may be helpful to increase therapists' use of more adaptive behaviors outside of session. An increase in adaptive behaviors might also imply an increase in interpersonal risk-taking behavior, which FAP theorists believe to be crucial in evoking client behavior. Likewise, the parallels found between reported frequency of out-of-session behavior and changes on the FIAT Q may indicate some strength in utility of these measurement techniques in research. Future research and study limitations are presented in the discussion.

Demonstrating Functional Analytic Psychotherapy as an Independent Variable in Efficacy Research Lindsey E. Knott, 2018

Functional Analytic Psychotherapy (FAP) is a contextual behavior therapy that takes an in-session, in-vivo focus to improve client outcomes. This in-vivo IV focus is distinctive of FAP and involves the therapist's utilization of contingencies in session to decrease problematic response classes and increase more adaptive response classes, i.e., a differential reinforcement procedure. This contingent responding is proposed to be FAP's mechanism of action leading to client change. FAP efficacy research mainly consists of small-n single case studies or group designs combining FAP with another CBT intervention. Maitland et al. (2016) distinguished FAP from SL sessions, suggesting potential utility in distinguishing FAP as an independent variable. The present study, using the data from Maitland et al. (2016), provides a more comprehensive analysis by assessing reliability between 3 independent coders, correlations with another FAP-specific fidelity metric, and investigating for possible mediator relationships between the FAP AF and outcomes. The alternative fidelity technique used for comparison was developed by Kanter-Schildcrout-Kohlenberg (2005) and involves coding each turn of speech as in-vivo talk directed at the therapy process, therapy relationship, or in-the-moment interactions, or not. If the FAP AF and in-vivo counts capture the presence or absence of FAP elements, they should be reliable across coders. Likewise, the in-vivo turns count should correlate with the 5-item FAP scale on the FAP AF, but neither should correlate with the 4-item SL scale, distinguishing FAP from SL. Finally, if the FAP AF acts as a proxy for FAP's mechanism of action, it should mediate outcomes. Results demonstrated mostly excellent reliability between coders. Exact agreement on the FAP scale items ranged from 71% to 95%. Inter-method correlations indicated strong positive relationships between and within coders on the adherence metrics. Furthermore, the FAP scale and IV turns count significantly differed in FAP sessions compared to SL sessions, suggesting the measures distinguished the presence of FAP from its absence. As such, the FAP scale may be useful in documenting FAP as an independent variable, providing a reliable but less intensive method for assessing treatment fidelity. However, no adherence metrics replicated Maitland et al. (2016) in serving as a statistical mediator of outcomes. The individual-level relationships observed between adherence and symptom outcomes suggested significant variability and an absence of an overall dose-response relationship. The lack of a clear dose-response relationship could indicate a limitation of the adherence measures used. Not all FAP interactions are equal in their potency, an effect which is hard to quantify. Implications, future directions, and limitations are discussed.
