

But the means by which food security is achieved, and for whom, matters fundamentally to the relationship between food security and sociopolitical stability.

Food security achieved via greater productivity per worker/ha/m³, reduced post-harvest loss, improved food distribution systems and/or social protection policies directly reduces sociopolitical instability.

Conversely, local food security achieved through measures that have adverse spillover effects – increased natural resources exploitation or beggar-thy-neighbor trade, market, NRM, or IP policies – can have adverse sociopolitical effects that ultimately aggravate underlying food security stress.
