handling the fine dresses of Emindal cloth when she wasn't running wild through the forests and fields. Her father was distant and obsessed with regaining his place at court. The only visitors they ever saw were secretive men and women who brought news of the events at court, news of wars and alliances of the queen's failure to conceive an heir of the Princess Roharren's madness and Prince Norue's growing power and of the disappearance of the magicians. The visitors came and went plotting revenge for mysterious slights, eating and drinking their way through the storerooms while Hashan House fell down around them. But one day while hunting in the forest, Lord Hashan was murdered. And Angarred, in her outrage, determined to go to the capital and seek justice from the king for surely the murderer of a lord, even an exiled lord, should be punished. But the naive young woman finds a swirling world of palace intrigue, a dying queen and an ensorcelled king. With the help of Mathewar, a handsome but very troubled magician, she journeys from the crowded streets of Pergodi to the Enchanted Forest, from the deadly land of the Others to the arches of the Giant's Bridge as she begins to unravel the secrets of the kingdom and her own history.
