

Attitude-Strengthening Factor	Strategies Promoting Sensitivity to Occasions for Critical Thinking
Direct Experience	Students take on the role of architects and urban planners. To design and develop plans, they must apply mathematics to a realistic situation. In negotiating with the opposing party, they explore the feasibility of different plans and engage in trade-offs to reach a workable solution.
Sensory Experience	Students apply the mathematical concepts by graphing data and creating scale models of their housing proposal. This kinesthetic experience authentically reflects the work of architects and urban planners.
Emotional Reactions	In the process of defining and presenting their position on how the land should be zoned, students become stakeholders with an emotional investment in their plan. Emotions become heightened as students on one side work through the negotiations process with the other party.
Freely Chosen Behavior	While engaged in planning, making recommendations for, and negotiating over the zoning change, students frequently must make choices and develop personal positions. Multiple models embodying the underlying mathematical concepts in the unit allow students to choose a preferred mode of representation for solving each problem at hand.
Attitude Rehearsal	During the four weeks typically spent on the unit, students encounter many occasions where critical thinking is desirable. These occasions occur in the context of a real-world problem that motivates students to continue to engage in applying good thinking.
