24. The term disruptive innovation describes a process in which a new technology or business model displaces an established one. This process is often driven by the entry of new entrants who offer a more affordable, simpler, and more accessible solution than the established market leader. Disruptive innovation is a key concept in understanding the dynamics of technological change and market competition.

19. The term "total potential" encompasses the entire possible environmental performance, including the potential for future improvements.

Although the use of a small size of 1000 individuals per group is not recommended, this treatment is necessary for the statistical purposes. In the next experiment, the group size should be 2000, and the number of replicates should be 1000 individuals per treatment. This will provide more precise estimates of the mean and standard deviation.
