Introduction

Recent second language pedagogical approaches emphasize natural communication without teaching grammar. Although it is not impossible to acquire an L2 without learning grammar, it is important to note that learners who receive form-focused instruction as part of their language learning achieve higher levels of L2 knowledge.

Concerning form-focused instruction, there are a number of positions. However, there are at least three models of the relation between implicit and explicit (subconsciously acquired and consciously learned) knowledge. (1) The non-interface position (e.g., Krashen, 1982) claims that formal instruction has little effect on SLA because explicit knowledge for the accumulation of metalinguistic knowledge cannot be converted into implicit knowledge. (2) The strong interface position (e.g., Sharwood-Smith, 1981) says that explicit knowledge becomes implicit knowledge by practice. Negative evidence is necessary for distinguishing the different properties between L1 and L2 structures. (3) The weak interface position (e.g., Ellis, 1990) affirms that in some cases, depending on the nature of the target structure, instruction can work directly in natural communication, but in other cases instruction contributes to explicit declarative knowledge rather than implicit procedural knowledge.

The claims of the ineffectiveness of instruction and the universality of acquisition order of the non-interface position are based on only the study of morphemes. I argue in this paper that the acquisition order of morphemes is not innate but is based on the interaction with perception to a situation, cognitive strategies, experience, and frequency of input. It appears that there is some universal acquisition order to the extent of cognitive development, but the acquisition order is not necessarily related to accurate acquisition. Thus, it is necessary to study the acquisition of not only morphemes but also syntax. The strong-interface position focuses on consciousness-raising (C-R). C-R
