1992). Furthermore, the authors of the Journal of Interpersonal Violence have been criticized for being too "mainstream" in their approach to domestic violence. In contrast to these criticisms, other researchers have argued that the journal's focus on a broad range of issues, including the role of culture, gender, and social structure, has been a strength. The journal's commitment to a multidisciplinary approach, drawing on psychology, sociology, law, and public health, has also been praised. The journal's focus on the experiences of women and children, and its commitment to a feminist perspective, have also been noted as strengths.
