

CRITICAL CARE NURSE

Everyday meeting and working with relatives of critically ill in a unit of intensive medicine is extremely difficult. It is therefore necessary to have a good knowledge of techniques of correct and professional communication. By doing this, we achieve a genuine human relationship and we can communicate well with our relatives. First of all, they want this from us. We must be aware that in addition to us, we are deeply concerned about our relatives who trust us. We need to know them, and we must constantly try to help and support them. The way information will be transmitted is important for establishing a good relationship between family members and a team in the intensive medicine unit. The success of treating life-threatening patients in the intensive care unit depends primarily on team work and well organized interaction of all medical professions and experts who are involved in the treatment. In doing so, we cannot in any way ignore the role and responsibility of nursing care. The level, method and extent of communication in the nursing process depend on all participants. In a relationship a healthy man - a sick person must always adjust to the nurse. This applies to communication behaviors, speech modes, the extent of information and the use of individual resources. For communication, feedback is crucial. It is therefore important that the receiver receives the message - receives the information, interprets it and answers the transmitter, gives it feedback and responds to it. Typically, people accept the messages selectively; those who are in line with personality, expectations, value systems, etc., are easily accepted, but resistance to new information appears. Those who are critically ill are faced with a difficult situation when they receive their family member into the intensive care unit because they come to an unknown environment with highly developed technological equipment, most of which depends on the lives of their loved ones. They instantly change their lives, care for their dear ones, and at the same time fight their own fears to lose it. The information is incomprehensible or interpreted differently, which leads to resistance and opposition to communication. Resistance is a sign that there is a lack of adaptable communicator, that is, a healthcare professional. It is important that interpersonal communication
