host that are not accessible to immune effector molecules and mechanisms may acquire host derived masking molecules can vary their surface molecules and can produce molecules that block or misguide the host immune responses The host s interactions with the parasite on the other hand are critical for the initiation and induction of host signaling events that are critical in mounting formidable defensive immune responses against the invading parasite Therefore the ability of a parasite to successfully establish infection and cause disease largely depends on its interaction with the host and the ability of the host to mount successful and effective resistance Thus studying host parasite interactions and cross talks is critical for understanding parasite infection and adaptation mechanisms within the host as well as for developing strategies for effective prevention and control of parasitic infections in humans and animals The topic will cover a wide spectrum of parasitic protozoa and helminths and provide an opportunity to share new molecular and translational advances in parasitic infections and diseases
