McGuinness, 2022-10-01 This thesis describes in depth studies of the remarkable electronic transport within the ultrahigh conductivity delafossite metals PtCoO₂ and PdCoO₂ using the tool of focused ion beam FIB microstructuring Despite being first synthesised over 50 years ago important questions remain regarding both the origin of the unusually high conductivity of these compounds and the consequences of their unique properties for unconventional electronic transport such as that within the ballistic regime The thesis explores both these areas High energy electron irradiation is used to examine the effects of deliberately introducing point defects into PdCoO₂ and PtCoO₂ demonstrating that the extremely low resistivity of these materials stems from an extreme purity as high as 1 defect in 120 000 atoms rather than a novel scattering suppression mechanism In addition studies of the electronic transport in micron scale squares of these metals show that their broadly hexagonal Fermi surfaces lead not only to long range ballistic behaviour but novel ballistic regime phenomena which cannot be observed in materials with a higher symmetry Fermi surface The Publisher and Bookseller, 1928 Official organ of the book trade of the United Kingdom Federal Regulatory Directory CQ Press, 2013-11-04 The Federal Regulatory Directory Sixteenth Edition continues to offer a clear path through the maze of complex federal agencies and regulations providing to the point analysis of regulations Information packed profiles of more
