SEGMENTED STEMS: Prickly Pear 295

Coastal Prickly Pear (continued)

Coastal Prickly Pear
yellow spines on flat pads

Eastern Prickly Pear
white or brown spines

Cockspur Prickly Pear
thick, smaller pads

Compare: Coastal Prickly Pear is easily confused with Eastern Prickly Pear (pg. 299), which is widespread across the eastern United States. Both species can be spineless. When spines are present on Coastal pads, they are yellow, not white or brown as in Eastern. Cockspur Prickly Pear (pg. 299), which also can be spineless in southeastern Texas on coastal sand dunes, has thicker, smaller pads than Coastal.

Notes: Coastal Prickly Pear hybridizes frequently with Engelmann Prickly Pear (pg. 299) in southeastern Texas and in Louisiana, forming a yellow-spined, tree-like cactus that can grow as tall as 10 feet (3 m). Also native to Central and South America, Mexico, Bermuda and West Indies.

This prickly pear became an invasive weed after being introduced to South Africa and Australia to grow for cattle fodder and as food for cochineal insects, from which an acid is extracted to produce a red dye. It has invaded and formed dense infestations over large areas of Kruger National Park in South Africa, partly due to elephants, which eat the fruit and pads, and disperse the seeds. Once called the worst weed in Australia, burying 60 million acres (24 million ha) in the state of Queensland under dense mats as deep as 6 1/2 feet (2 m). Introduction of South American Cactus Moths has been successful in controlling this weed in many areas of Australia. Ironically, cochineal insects have also been used to eradicate this prickly pear.
