Double Displacement Reactions (Precipitation Lab)

Required reading: Ebbing, 11th Edition Chapters 2 and 4.

- Naming compounds
- Balancing equations
- Solubility rules
- Molecular and Ionic equations
- Displacement reactions

Learning Goals:

- To be able to write IUPAC names and formulas of ionic compounds using crossover rule.
- Understand the principle of metathesis reactions and be able to write formulas of products for metathesis reactions.
- Balance chemical equations for ionic compounds.
- To be able to understand and use solubility rules to predict the formation of precipitate.
- To be able to write ionic and net ionic equations and determine spectator ions in a given reaction.

Background information and theory:

When two aqueous solutions of ionic compounds react to form a new ionic substance that is not soluble in water, the presence of a solid (or a precipitate) is observed in the mixture. This type of reaction is called a precipitation reaction. A metathesis reaction is a reaction between compounds that, when written as a molecular equation, it looks like there is an exchange between cations and anions. If one of these products is not soluble, according to solubility rules (table 4.1 of your textbook), then the reaction will proceed and the formation a solid will be observed. If both products are soluble in water then the ions will remain in solution and no reaction will take place; the formation of a solid substance is the driving force for these reactions.

The following reaction is an example of a metathesis reaction:

the following reaction:

won't proceed since both potential products KOH and NaCl are soluble in water.

In this experiment, you will be mixing aqueous solutions and observing the formation of precipitates. A table of ions can be used to write formulas of ionic compound: Refer to table 2.4, 2.5 and 2.6 of your textbook. Use the solubility table 4.1, pg. 131 of your textbook to predict solubility of products.
