

FROM THE BRUSH OF

David Bray

EMPIRE LIBERTY

In 1960, my old friend Captain Peter Elphick found himself in command of a vessel under repair in Osaka, Japan. In a nearby berth an elderly cargo ship, the Mentor was being scrapped. Peter didn't pay much attention to this old-timer, but he would have done if he had been aware of her story. This ship was built as the Empire Liberty, and her design had a significant effect on the progress of WW2.

In the late 1930s Britain imported about half of her food, all of her fuel oil, and huge quantities of raw materials. As the war progressed, she also imported huge quantities of munitions and war materiel. All of these commodities were carried in cargo ships, and all transited the Atlantic Ocean, one way or another.

This vital lifeline was vulnerable to attack from U-boats and from the air. Back in 1917, U-boats of the German Navy had sunk huge numbers of allied merchantmen, rendering the ultimate survival of the nation in serious doubt. It is on record that during April of that year a total of 397 British and allied vessels were lost to U-boat action. Very quickly the convoy system was introduced, and casualties declined. Nevertheless, in the early years of WW2, large numbers of merchant ships were being lost to enemy action; between 30 and 100 ships were being sunk per month. Replacement hulls were urgently required.

At the time, the UK had thirty shipyards capable of building ocean-going ships, but the construction of new cargo ships was not a top priority. Warship construction took precedence, as did repair jobs. It was quicker and cheaper to repair than to build new. Also, yards were unable to work at full capacity. Blackout requirements precluded the working of night shifts, and of course, all British yards were open to the elements. Shipyards were a prime target for the administrations of the Luftwaffe. Shortages of skilled labour and materials exacerbated the difficulties.

The town of Sunderland had the nation's biggest concentration of shipyards and engine builders. About 13 shipyards built mostly workaday cargo ships and tankers. Sunderland yards didn't build battleships, aircraft carriers or liners. Sunderland built cargo ships.

One long-established, family-owned yard was that of Joseph L. Thompson at North Sands. Owned by Major Sir Robert N. Thompson, the yard was ably run and managed by his son Robert Cyril Thompson - Mr Cyril. During the early 1930s the yard, in common with every other shipyard came upon hard times. The Wall Street crash in 1929 led to the world's deepest recession. International trade collapsed, and thousands of merchant ships were laid up or scrapped. Orders for new ships were non-existent, and many orders were cancelled. Shipyards laid off men and closed their gates, many for good. The irony was that the twenty or so yards that were closed permanently would have been priceless assets a few years later, as would have been the many ships which had been scrapped.

"ORDERS FOR NEW SHIPS WERE NON-EXISTENT"

Thompsons were able to survive the depression with a small amount of non-ship steel construction keeping a small workforce employed, meanwhile, improvements were being made to the yard for the more efficient building of ships. At the same time, Mr Cyril
