

entitled to receive the same reward as his neighbor who spends the whole day in the house. At first, those below the average will become wealthy because they may receive a share of the wealth that belonged to the minority group who happen to be the above average workers.

However, the minority are not naïve as to realize the exploitation imposed on them and may refuse to work or to show their intelligence. Instead of a nation living happily thereafter, it will continue experiencing a decline in its economic performance as long as the moral codes are held.

Lack of incentive to employees will result in a declining economy as they withhold their ability and intelligence. People with the capability of becoming the pillars of the society will hinder their intelligence to prevent themselves from exploitation, and as a result, the incapable will occupy high occupations in the government or industries, not because they have the ability to move them, but because, the minorities (smart people) have refused to be exploited.

Production will continue to drop as a result of poor management until the government realizes the importance of incentives to workers.

However, if the government continues to hold moral codes (as in the case of Washington), production will continue to drop. In Rand's book we find that, the pillars of the society (Atlas) were not satisfied with the way world was performing in the essence of morality (Younkins, 173).

They wanted to bring change to the society because they were confident that, they were responsible for bringing converting it. However, they became enemies to the public for trying to divert from moral codes. They still held their position and were confident that a nation would not grow economically if moral codes were valued at the expense of employee recognition.

In the story of Atlas shrugged, Rand opposed the maxims that, "money is the root of all evil". Many people believe that, the evils that exist in society are a result of money, however this is not true. Rand asserts that, money act as the exchange medium where goods are produced (by men).

If no goods were produced, money would just be pieces of paper. To get money, you have to earn it through applying the ability one has. That's why we have doctors, artists, teachers, farmers, and the list is endless engaging themselves in different activities.

Rand refuted the claim that money is the root of all evil and observed that, for one to survive, he needs money. Money is honestly earned by those who have the ability and
