

Figure 4-10—Oil Flow—Latching Position

back resulting from raising heavy implements over rough terrain with the control valve in the latching position.

Control Valve. The control valve, Figure 5, directs flow of oil for raising or lowering an implement or in shift control, from applied to the control of the valve. When in position control, oil on the left side actuates the valve.

Relief Valve. The relieving valve, Figure 6, is normally open. The pressure of the valve determines whether the oil from the pump is directed to the cylinder to raise an implement or is to the reservoir.

Check Valve. The back pressure valve, Figure 7, prevents a constant pressure of low magnitude from the reservoir to the relieving valve.

Increased tractor hydraulic system sensitivity and durability which are desired in certain implement applications can now be obtained by using two special control valves, control valve loadings and an external, or external hydraulic system flow which are available for power units. The control valve, control valve loading and flow can be supplied in all Ford Tractors with the control type hydraulic system.

Increased sensitivity is provided by the new control valve and loading in the following manner. The left hand of the control valve is connected to the line leading to the top tank is connected to the control valve forward to a lift position. This, in effect, means that resistance required by changing draft conditions will be of a smaller magnitude. A smaller diameter hole on both the inlet and outlet sides of the relieving valve, means that as oil is introduced to the valve, the pressure loading in the system will be at a lower rate. When the smaller magnitude resistance loading effect to the new control valve and the control valve.

A line incorporated in the loading in place of the line which will a low value in the hydraulic line increases the rate of flow of the implement. The rate of flow is faster because it acts as the draft loading in a loading position and the control valve moves in a loading position, the control valve of the draft valve is raised.

It is recommended that whenever the new control valve and control valve loading are installed in a tractor that the hydraulic flow also be installed. This flow can be installed in tractors where all eight hydraulic ports are used and where the control valve is provided for the new hydraulic pump in the tractor.

4. Hydraulic Control System Oil Flow

Normal Position. When the pump is continuously in forcing oil to the hydraulic system, whenever the system is operating, the oil will be returned to the reservoir or return. When the control valve is closed, oil is pumped into the pressure line which is closed when the transmission back pressure and check valve are closed. A drilled hole and pressure ring under the control valve is connected to the check ring and the pressure valve. The check and back pressure valve are closed, therefore, oil will flow down the pressure line to the relieving valve chamber. It will not flow to the control valve chamber in the forward loading and apply position against the seat ring. The oil will continue to build in the control position ring to the control valve leading to the control valve and over the oil.
