

China After Mao DBQ

China in 1976 was one of the poorest countries in the world, far poorer than India. They were barely scratching out a living and their population density made it difficult for them to feed their population. There was very little to build on other than the fact that the party had incredible authority. With this authority, Deng set in motion a series of critical changes early on in his leadership to achieve national stability and significant economic growth.

Surviving the Great Famine of 1959 where millions died, Deng reformed the land system and increased agriculture production, initially in just one part of the country. He extended farmers' land leases and encouraged them to profit from any grain they grew over and above what they owed. He introduced high-yielding varieties of cereal grains and synthetic fertilizers emulating the best innovations of the "Green Revolution". As a result the agricultural sector exploded with farmers producing three times as much in 20 years, all with less labor.
