AIRPLANE ZONING - DESCRIPTION AND OPERATION

1. General

- A. The uniform method of dividing the airplane structure into various identifiable areas, called "zones," was developed to simplify the location of units/components/areas, the preparation of job instructions, and the identification of access doors and panels.

2. Airplane Zoning

- A. The "zoning" process employs a three-digit numbering system to identify the areas into which the airplane has been divided and subdivided. The first digit identifies the large areas of the airplane, called "major zones" (upper fuselage, wings, etc.). Each major zone is divided into "submajor zones" (flight compartment, etc.), identified by the second digit. Submajor zones are broken down into "zones" (radome, etc.), identified by the third digit.
- B. Zone numbers run preferentially from inboard to outboard, front to back, and bottom to top. Wherever applicable, one digit of the zone number will indicate left or right zones by using an odd number for the left side and an even number for the right side. Zones that straddle the centerline are assigned an odd or even zone number.
- C. The zones will be defined, wherever possible, by actual physical boundaries, such as wing spars, major bulkheads, partitions, control surfaces, etc. Individual zone numbers will be assigned to major structural components, such as passenger and cargo doors, landing gears, elevators, flaps, ailerons, etc. The area enclosed by the wing-to-fuselage fillets will have individual fuselage zone numbers. The center wing area within the fuselage and areas between the wing and fuselage floor will have fuselage zone numbers.
- D. Zone boundaries will enclose related structures, such as door-jambs; that is, a jamb for a specific door will not be split by a zone boundary. A unit or component mounted on a zone boundary will take its zone number from the zone in which it is removed.
