

ustrial Revolution may play in the rise of cancer. Specifically, he traces the shift from TB to cancer over the past 200 years to the crisis of depersonalized nursing. As well, he seeks to show that those attempts to attribute cancer solely to a foreign invader—whether virus, microbe or carcinogenic agent, as in cigarette smoking—fail to take account of the unity of patient and environment and of the underlying needs of the human being, which the disease reflects. In contrast to this combative stance which focuses on the tumor, Booth urges a holistic approach based on reassessing the person's purpose and life context.

Although there is an inevitable element of speculation in such a study, I found Booth's work very thorough, well-documented and convincing, given the tenets of depth psychology. He makes definite demands of the reader: the breadth of his holistic vision challenges our familiar mechanistic mind set. This, coupled with Booth's condensed style and wide-ranging references, gives one the feeling that the author may be trying to do too much in one book. Perhaps that is more an indication of the far-reaching implications of Booth's work, which are tantalizingly understated, than it is a criticism of the text itself. At times his experimental design seems hard to follow, but the numerous tables and charts in the appendix help to clarify this. Inclusion of an index would have made this volume even more useful. However, the rich rewards of this provocative and seminal work far outweigh these quibbles. The full bibliography lists Booth's numerous articles, itself a valuable addition to the literature, and the list of "works cited" offers a fine resource for further study in the field.

This book has important implications for both theologian and pastor. It represents a significant attempt to integrate the various healing disciplines around a common problem. To this end the divergent views of Freud, Jung, von Weizsacker, Boisen, Dubos, LeShan, Smithers and others are interwoven with impressive skill. The viewpoint it presents is particularly pertinent to process theology, for Booth is in the forefront of those who seek to understand human wholeness beyond the Cartesian body/mind split. Booth's work offers a method of operationalizing psychological and religious factors in somatic disease. The material also has practical relevance for the pastor, pastoral counselor or chaplain who may often be the only professional who is still able to see the person as a whole. Booth, whose Christian outlook is infused throughout his work, has special words for clergy in a chapter on cancer therapy. In his view, the human problem of the cancer patient is often ignored by medical specialists and he believes that a pastor can have a healing influence by giving supportive attention to the person in the context of his or her life history and by offering the opportunity for reflection on the patient's life pattern. By contributing this relational understanding of the person and disease, Booth's book points to the re-emerging relevance of the religious professional in healing.
