Gordon, 2013-03-09 The British philosopher Stephan Toulmin in his The Uses of Argument made the provocative claim that logic is generalized jurisprudence For Toulmin logic is the study of nonns for practical argumentation and decision making In his view mathematical logicians were preoccupied with fonnalizing the concepts of logical necessity consequence and contradiction at the expense of other equally important issues such as how to allocate the burden of proof and make rational decisions given limited resources He also considered it a mistake to look primarily to psychology linguistics or the cognitive sciences for answers to these fundamentally nonnative questions Toulmin s concerns about logic writing in the 1950 s are equally applicable to the field of Artificial Intelligence today The mainstream of Artificial Intelligence has focused on the analytical and empirical aspects of intelligence without giving adequate attention to the nonnative regulative functions of knowledge representation problem solving and decision making Nonnative issues should now be of even greater interest with the shift in perspective of AI from individual to collective intelligence in areas such as multi agent systems cooperative design distributed artificial intelligence and computer supported cooperative work Networked virtual societies of humans and software agents would also require virtual legal systems to fairly balance interests resolve conflicts and promote security
