

ALBAM CLOTHING

The term 'football casual' in modern-day Britain conjures up two sets of sartorial imagery: the halcyon days of wedge haircuts and fast-moving trends that revolved around fresh trainers and imported designer labels and, in stark contrast, the more modern image of rotund, middle-aged men with a penchant for boot-cut jeans and jackets with goggles in the hood. While one form of the 'casual' may not have been the most refined in terms of menswear, it was progressive. The latter example is one mired in stagnation and a desire to re-live memories which have, over the years, become an idealized parody of what they truly were. Why am I talking about casuals? Well, the early success of Albam owes a lot to this once great sub-culture. Or rather it owes something to the more progressive elements of this movement, although most of the people involved wouldn't even dream of calling themselves a casual. Albam has since grown up, but in its formative days it created a buzz with its astonishingly simple, yet much sought-after Fisherman's Capote. It may seem crude to attribute the rise of one of London's most influential lifestyle brands to a single jacket and its association with a particular sub-culture – and, of course, this may be an over-simplified version of Albam's early success – but that single jacket has been paid homage on Casual Connoisseur tees. For many years, Albam had 'casuals10' as a discount code on their website.

Timing is everything. As 'heritage' began to work its way into the psyche of the savvy menswear consumers in the UK, Albam flourished with its 'crafted in England' products. These products were not simply manufactured, they were 'crafted'. Arguably, they encompassed the initial stages of this movement where craftsmanship and origin were king. Albam had a product that seemed genuine at a time when brands would rise or fall based on their perceived authenticity. Beards and wax jackets were most definitely 'in', and Albam executed a distribution scheme that was so tight it may have ensured their longevity. The brand was both honest and desirable: traits that have served it well. When every menswear brand and their dog reinvented themselves, played up their history and tried to cash in on the heritage boom, Albam continued to do what they do best: manufacture honest products in the UK. For all Albam courted the heritage movement, ultimately it allowed consumers to interpret their product in whatever way they saw fit.
