

Overbite reduction

Removable appliances are very effective in correcting a deep overbite, especially in a growing patient. An upper removable appliance with an anterior bite plane is used which disengages the molars by 2–3 mm whilst at the same time establishing lower incisor contact with the bite plane (Fig. 6). Eruption of the posterior teeth produces a reduction in the overbite. It is essential that the inter-incisor angle is corrected at the completion of treatment so that an occlusal stop between the upper and lower incisors is produced preventing re-eruption of the incisors and a relapse of the overbite. Bite planes are usually used in conjunction with fixed appliances to help the overbite reduction (Figures 7a–d) or can be used as an aid to restoration of the anterior teeth. Figures 8a–d show a patient with a deep bite who had marked enamel erosion. Porcelain crowns were to be placed on the anterior teeth to restore them, but the deep bite made this technically difficult. The overbite

Space maintenance

Space maintainers are rarely indicated in orthodontic treatment but occasionally can be used, particularly if the upper canine is buccally crowded. Whilst the extraction of the first premolars will often create space for the canines, there is a danger that the space will close before the canine erupts as the buccal teeth drift medially. Figures 9a–e illustrate such a case where the fitting of a space maintainer proved useful. The appliance was fitted just prior to the emergence of the permanent canines. The four first premolars were then extracted and the appliance left in position until the canines erupted. This took about 6 months and saved a considerable amount of extra treatment for the patient by allowing spontaneous alignment of the canines.
