

Experiment 1: The Importance of Cells

- All organisms are made of cells
 - Many organisms are single-celled
 - Even for multicellular organisms, the cells are the basic unit of structure and function
- The cells are composed entirely of material that can be seen
- The cells are defined by their distinct boundaries called walls

Experiment 2: The study of cells, microscopes and microorganisms and the ways of magnification

- The discovery and study of cells progressed with the invention of microscopes in 1590 and their improvement in the 17th century
- An upright microscope is light, visible light passes through the specimen and then through glass lenses
 - The lenses collect light such that the image is magnified and the light is sent to your eyes
- Microscopes vary in magnification and resolving power
 - Magnification is the amount an object is made to be seen larger
 - Resolving power is a measure of image clarity
 - It is the minimum size between two points can be separated and still be distinguished as two separate points
 - Resolution is limited by the shortest wavelength of the radiation used for imaging
- The minimum wavelength of light microscopes is about 400 nanometers (nm), the end of a visible spectrum
- Light microscopes can magnify effectively for about 1,000 times the size of the actual specimen
 - At higher magnifications, the resolution is poor
- Structures observed in the light microscopes have enhanced contrast and are fixed/preserved and components to be studied is labelled as they stand still
- Since a light microscope can observe individual cells, it cannot resolve much of the internal structure, especially in organelles
- To observe smaller structures, we use an electron microscope (EM), which focuses a beam of electrons through the specimen or over the surface
 - Because electrons is indirectly related to wavelength, used electron microscopes require electron beams have much physical wavelengths than visible light, have lower resolution
 - Consequently, the resolution of a typical EM is about 0.1 nm (100,000 times better than the greatest EM is used for about 2 nm)
- Transmission electron microscope (TEM) was used mainly to study the structure of organelles of cells
 - A thin section of electron beam through a thin section of the specimen
 - The image is focused and magnified by electromagnets
