

1.60 New market halls were eventually constructed under Napoleon III, modelled on the design of the Gare d'Orléans. Ten pavilions reminiscent of iron umbrellas were built to protect the market people from the elements and to secure the city's supplies. There were fruit sellers and fishmongers, animals continued to be slaughtered, meat and dairy products were on sale, and other trades were plied in basements which already extended underground. Bistros thrived in the markets too: indeed, it was more or less de rigueur to end a night in Paris with a breakfast in Les Halles.

1.61 In "The Labyrinth in Culture and Society: Pathways to Winscen", the French economist Jacques Attali suggests life should take the form of a meander rather than a straight and narrow path.

But hasn't city planning been increasingly concerned with the establishment of direct routes through urban spaces, rather than the chance to wander around, ever since the nineteenth century? Les Halles exemplifies the steady growth of this desire to standardise and sanitise urban space.
