Split the sample from one of the two pans as many times as necessary to reduce the sample to the size specified for the intended test. The portion of the material collected in the other pan may be reserved for reduction in size for other tests. As check for effective splitting, determine the mass of each part of the split. If the ratio of the two masses differs by more than 5 percent, corrective action must be taken. For Quartering <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Place the sample on a hard, clean, leveled surface where there will be neither loss of material nor the accidental addition of foreign material. Mix the material thoroughly by turning the entire sample over a minimum of three times. With the last turning, shovel the entire sample into a conical pile by depositing each shovelful on top of the preceding one. Flatten the conical pile to a uniform thickness and diameter by pressing down with a shovel. The diameter should be four to eight times the thickness. Divide the flattened pile into four approximately equal quarters with a shovel or trowel. Remove two diagonally opposite quarters, including all fine materials, and brush the cleared spaces clean.
