

YT-1300 CONFIGURATIONS

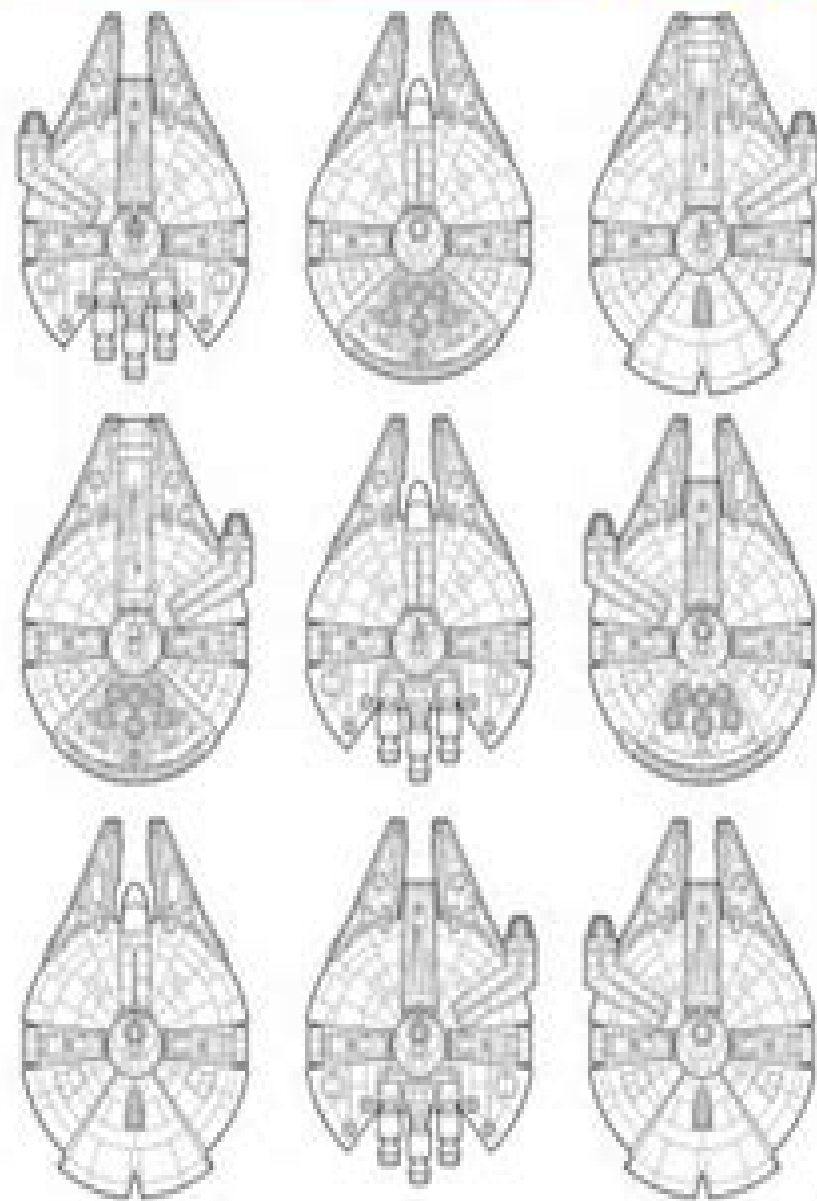

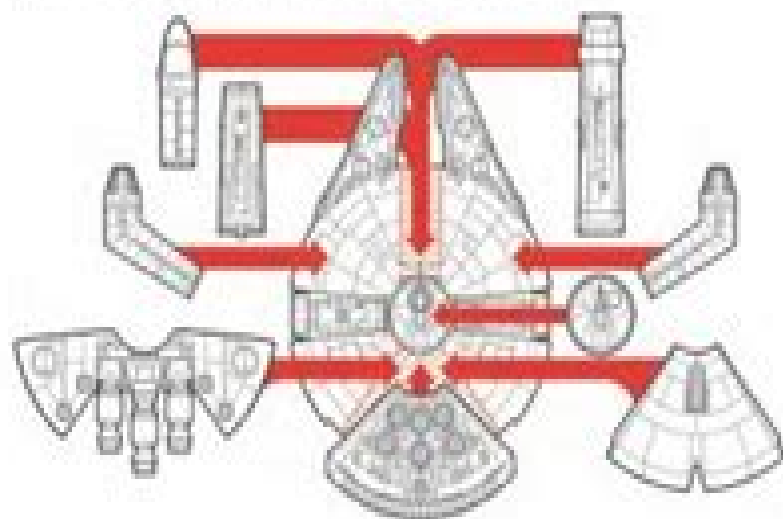

A thought the variety of YT-1300 sub-variants and configurations featured external dashboard-mounted controls, CEC offered modular options for gun-mounted consoles, control-mounted consoles, console-mounted blasters, and console-mounted blasters. Some YT-1300s appeared to have no console at all, as CEC also offered options for an "embedded" console, located under a heavily armored but without any windows or displays, a console that relied heavily on visual sensors for navigation.

While some enthusiasts incorrectly maintain that certain YT-1300 configurations were distinct models of the "YV-1300," communications about the ship's design length are more telling. Even after CEC's major production of the YT-1300, numerous manufacturers for the ship's hull length appeared on official documentation, as seen in a specification that was distributed to representatives of over the galaxy. Some authorities attributed the gaps to a manufacturing inconsistency that was allegedly corrected after CEC or the Bureau of Ships and Fisheries (BSF), while others blamed a policy of misinformation within the highly competitive shipbuilding industry. A few industry insiders suggested that CEC may have had the ship's estimated length set by the BSF before CEC incorporated the longest hull length into the design. Many pilots became aware of the gaps when traffic controllers directed YT-1300s into docking bays that were too small.

Yet another problem arose when clearing insurance policies that CEC did not authorize the publication of various YT-1300 design schematics that existed in circulation, and which featured costly differences in materials that could be found in existing ships. Some of these schematics were based on legitimate alternate designs that CEC offered to buyers seeking customization, but other schematics represented configurations that CEC never produced. Evidently, early in the design phase, numerous groups were offered early sets of prototype deck plans and could modify them to a CEC-approved office. While details and surface markings, the prototypes were often CEC-made, making it easy to mistake the plans as schematics for actual starships.

As a public service, CEC provided the following diagrams to distinguish the various known YT-1300 transport vehicles from unauthorized options.
